The new administration has environmental justice leaders looking over their shoulders. Axing many Obama-era policies, Trump’s team has signaled it will roll back clean-air rules, weaken clean-water protections, and continue to support fossil fuels. All of this comes at a time when the state of the planet and its people is more urgent and dire than it’s ever been.

But the good news is there’s a new political climate taking shape across the country: The climate justice movement is moving beyond the Obama years and moving into a new political climate. This is a time when the environmental justice movement is expanding, adapting, and finding new ways to fight for a just and sustainable future.

The new climate justice movement is built on a strong foundation ofgrassroots organizing, community engagement, and legal victories. It is a movement that has been building for years, and it is now poised to take on the new administration in a new way.

This is not to say that the new administration will not be a daunting challenge. Trump’s team has already signaled its intention to roll back many of the Obama-era policies that were critical to protecting our planet and our communities. But the climate justice movement is ready to take on this challenge.

The new climate justice movement is built on a strong foundation ofgrassroots organizing, community engagement, and legal victories. It is a movement that has been building for years, and it is now poised to take on the new administration in a new way.

The new climate justice movement is now focused on building a new vision for the planet and our communities. This new vision is one that is focused on environmental justice, sustainability, and the common good. It is a vision that is focused on creating a world where everyone has access to clean air, clean water, and healthy communities.

The new climate justice movement is focused on creating a new political climate that is built on the values of environmental justice, sustainability, and the common good. This new political climate is one that is focused on creating a world where everyone has access to clean air, clean water, and healthy communities.

The new climate justice movement is now poised to take on the new administration in a new way. It is a movement that is ready to fight for a just and sustainable future. It is a movement that is ready to take on the new administration and build a new political climate that is built on the values of environmental justice, sustainability, and the common good.